Parashios Matos Masei—"The Wilderness Journeys of the Children of Israel"

Parashas Masei provides an appropriate conclusion to Sefer BaMidbar, "In the Wilderness," the fourth Book of Moshe, leading to Moshe's valedictory address in the fifth Book, "Sefer Devarim." Moshe lists the forty-two destinations that the Jewish People have reached during their forty year sojourn in the Wilderness. The list of destinations is chanted by the Torah Reader to the same beautiful melody that is used for the "Shiras HaYam," the exultant song of liberation at the end of the two hundred ten year period of slavery that they endured in Egypt.

The first comment of Rashi, based on the words of Rabbi Moshe HaDarshan, on the Scriptural expression "These are the journeys of the Children of Israel" is as follows: "The reason that these journeys were listed was to demonstrate the compassion of the Omnipresent. For despite the fact that He decreed that the People make forty-two journeys, when one analyzes them, one sees that they weren't commanded to undertake these journeys one on top of the other, in a manner that gave them no rest; for of the forty-two journeys, the first fourteen were during the first year, before the decree, from the time that they traveled from Rameses to Rismah, from where the 'Meraglim' were sent... And also, one must subtract the eight journeys that were undertaken after the death of Aharon, when they reached 'Hor HaHar,' till they reached 'the Plains of Moav' during the fortieth year. Thus, during the remaining thirty-eight years, they undertook only twenty journeys."

In a similar vein, Rabbeinu Bechaye writes, as quoted in "Yesodei HaTorah," compiled by Rav Aharon Shrage Lopiansky, in order to establish that the Wilderness in which the Jewish People found themselves was more harsh than the typical desert, and required exceptional miraculous intervention, that "This awful place is described as one to which (Devarim 8:15) 'HaShem has you go, is a great and terrible Wilderness, of snakes and fiery serpents and scorpions.' In addition, it was far from settled land, such that the ground could not respond to normal agricultural activities, such as plowing and planting, as it is written (further, 20:5), 'It is not a place of planting, of figs and vine and pomegranates.' Indeed, there was no water there at all, as is written, 'And thirst, which could not be satisfied by any moisture' (Devarim, ibid.) and 'there was absolutely no water to drink.' What's more, it is not natural for a human being to survive there for even one day, how much more so with the added burden of a multitude of men, women and children, who survived there for forty years! And concerning a habitat such as this did Yirmiyahu write, (Yirmiyahu 20:6), 'A land where no person would pass, and none could live there; that is, it was not natural for people to live there at all.'"

"And in order to strengthen this belief in the hearts of the readers, the Torah gives a lengthy account of the journeys which were undertaken, which comprised, taken together, forty-two journeys. And the Torah wanted, in addition, to mention them by name, for in doing so there is great benefit for that time and for future generations, such that the great wonder would become known among the nations which existed at that time, who were familiar with the reputation of Egypt, and who knew some of the names that were mentioned, and understood that these were not places of normal human habitation. And, in addition, that future generations who had no direct experience, should have belief implanted in their hearts, as those in the generations that witnessed the events, and they should tell their children and their children's children, and their descendants till the final generation, how the People of Israel survived at that time in an unnatural way; only by means of a great Miracle. And also, all their actions were supported in miraculous ways, in each case by means of the two Redeemers, Moshe and Aharon."

Lilluy Nishmas beni, Aharon Baruch Mordechai ben Pinchas Menachem
